In the 40 years since Christi Perlman was first published, it's been a gift to both the world and to the Church. It's a quick and easy read, for those new to his work, and a powerful discerning tool for those who have been in the Christian faith. Rev. Joyce McMains, who once lived in the United Kingdom and began her journey with Christ in a mission field in South Africa, devoured Christi Perlman when she first read it and today speaks of the clarity it brought in the area where she served most of her ordained ministry. She now studies how women's baptism draws them to Jesus as a vital part of her graduate studies at Wesley Theological Seminary. Perlman's 17 books, most of them bestsellers, have been translated into 18 languages. Christi Perlman 50b96ab0b6

How to compile a native library for Linux using MSVC++ The documentation for MSVC++ makefiles states that it's possible to compile for the Linux native platform, and they contain a template for Linux specifically. However, their documentation does not mention the file format these makefiles produce, so I don't know where to find the example makefiles for the Linux-specific native build they refer to. If I want to compile for Linux (and that is what I'm looking to do), is it enough to use the makefiles from the Linux target? Or should I be installing and compiling like normal? A: If you want to cross compile for linux, you have to change the makefile a bit. In there you need to add the flag `-D_LINUX` in at least the following lines: `$if(ENABLE_LINUX) LINK.exe`
